The word "pedigree" has come to be used with reference to plants in a sense which conveys a meaning that is altogether antruthful. An animal with a pedigree is one having a known ancestry. The parentage on both sides must be known for one or more generations. It has not been the custom among plant breeders, however, to keep a record of the parentage of plantsthat is, pedigrees have not been established, except very rarely. A pedigree in the case of a variety of plants propagated from seeds, as in the case of vegetables or grains, might have great value because it is the aim of the grower of such plants to secure uniformity in the product and to develop a strain which will come true from seeds.

propagated from seeds. To Secure a Plant Pedigree. with a pedigree two varieties must be may be continued with the progeny ina pedigree. The mere selection of plants of a variety, without regard to both male and female parents, does not establish a pedigree. A pedigree variety can only be established by growing plants from seed, and a seedling with a pedigree of the class of plants which are propagated by division is no better than one without, because the good qualities of the ancestors may or may not be transmitted. of this class which will help to fix and hold the type as with plants grown from seed, nor does a pedigree in the

PEDIGREE PLANTS.

Propagation by Division and Seed. Any variety of plants which is propagated by means of cuttings, layers, runners, grafts or by any method of division may have a pedigree, but it's value would not be enhanced thereby Plants which are propagated by division come just as nearly true-that is, are not more inclined to vary or sportwith a poor as with a good ancestry. A seedling from Ben Davis would when quite as well as one from Grimes' Golden. In the case of varieties of plants which are propagated from seeds the type is fixed and held by selection, and the more careful the selection, or. In other words, the better the pedigree, the more armly the type becomes fixed and the better the variety. With plants which are propagated by division selec tion has nothing to do with the fixedness of the variety. Plants of this
